

PRINCIPLES of KAHRA

July 2022

Research and data is owned and driven by Aboriginal people and communities and is acknowledged as such.

Aboriginal people, communities and researchers work respectfully and equitably together at all stages of research, from concept to translation, building trust and rapport.

Genuine consultation is undertaken directly with Aboriginal people and communities, including Elders and young people, from the beginning of the research process.

Research projects are designed and resourced to build the capacity of Aboriginal people and communities to undertake research through transfer of research skills, mentoring and delivering tailored training.

Researchers regularly check back with all Aboriginal people, communities and organisations who are involved, to communicate research progress, outcomes and actively seek guidance.

Aboriginal people and communities are included in the interpretation of research and evaluation findings.

